Regarding your request on food price formation data and analysis in Norway.

There is not established an entity for monitoring food prices in Norway. However, we do have data available on food prices at different levels of food chains obtained by different institutions and companies. See for example: http://ssb.no/, https://www.slf.dep.no/no/, http://nilf.no/om_nilf/Nyheter/temaer/priser_og_kostnader and http://www.nielsen.com/no/no.html

Food price transmission and transparency are important issues for our government, and there have been two government-appointed expert groups assessing features of the food chain. The first one in 2011with representative from stakeholders along the chain, consumer's organizations, economists and lawyers. Their works were presented in Report on Trading Conditions in the Food Industry submitted to the Government in April 2011 (NOU 2011:4) See:
http://www.regjeringen.no/nb/dep/lmd/dok/veiledninger_og_brosjyrer/2011/food-power-and-impotence.html?id=641717

The second one: The Law Committee appointed by the Government in October 2012 submitted its report in April 2013. (NOU 2013:6) In this report the Committee suggests an Act on Good Trading Practices in the grocery chain and the establishment of a "Trade Surveillance Authority" vested with the power to apply and enforce the Act. Current proposal seeks to merge "good trading practices" with a "consumer welfare standard" by drafting the good practices standard in order to provide transparency and to cater for consumer interests in the form of lower prices, extended choice, enhanced availability and quality.
The response from different stakeholders to the above reports has varied from positive by the farmers and producers/ suppliers to negative from the grocery chains.

Our government has so far not ended the process and concluded on further proceedings in this matter.
